This effect surfaces fully separated at the wingtip ( Figure 11e ) was also noticeable at 75 psf but was not seen at 100 the response is benign. Three features which psf. Thus, the LCO map for air, Figure 13, should be distinguish LCO wind-tunnel testing from flight used with caution, while that for heavy gas, Figure testing are the test environment, the sensitivity of the 12, is believed to be reliable for transonic flow with LCO behavior, and the wing loading condition. A turbulent boundary layer flow. On the other hand, good portion of the nonstationary nature of the comparison of the two figures provides insight into response shown in Figure 10 is related to the wind-the effect of the test gas on LCO behavior, with tunnel test environment. Transonic wind tunnels particular focus upon the effect of the speed of sound, ( even those with documented good flow control and and thus the reduced frequency, on LCO for a given quality ) are inherently noisy in the frequency range model. 0-100 Hz where all aeroelastic testing is focused. Numbers attached to boundaries in the Figures 12 and This is in contrast to the flight test environment where 13...
