Not illustrated. 1916 Excerpt: .at the time of contracting the fever, and my last forty-five cases of pneumonia have all recovered. Nor are the good results of the nonalcoholic treatment confined to the fact that a larger percentage of patients recover than when alcohol is used, but they have fewer complications, get well more promptly and are stronger and in better condition than those to whom alcohol has been administered. And, indeed, when we remember that alcohol lessens the functional activities of the digestive and assimilative organs, lowers muscular and nervous power, impairs the activity of the blood corpuscles, and diminishes the power of the whole body to resist disease, we can very readily see why it is detrimental and the only thing which remains a puzzle to us is why so many physicians still continue to use it. Let us now see what some of the world's celebrated physicians have to say on the subject. Dr. Nansen (Horsely, p. 179) writes as follows: My experience leads me to take a decided stand against the use of stimulants and narcotics of all kinds. It is often supposed that, even although spirits are not intended for daily use, they ought to be taken on an expedition for medical purposes. I would readily acknowledge this if any one would show me a single case in which such a remedy is necessary; but till this is done I shall maintain that the best course is to banish alcoholic drinks from the list...
